Dr Sterling works as a fisheries engineer conducting associated research and development for improving the eco-efficiency of fisheries. For 15 years he was also an active partner in a fishing business that operated two prawn trawlers in the Queensland east coast trawl fishery.

For 5 years in the early 1990's, Dr Sterling was a lecturer in fishing technology at the Australian Maritime College, where he also managed the Fishing Technology Unit and its flume tank. Previous to that he worked as a technician for 2 years with the Queensland Department of Primary Industries researching the status and dynamics of prawn stocks in the Torres Strait.
